Concept Note

"We live in a world where there is more and more information, and less and less meaning."- Jean Baudrillard. This quote reads true now more than it ever has in the history of time, and knowledge. As primary sources of information are more frequently digitized, access to that data is simultaneously becoming easier and harder. How can academics effectively use all that is at their disposal to effectively create a viable research model? That is the question of the hour. As libraries, universities, museums, and archives have digitalised their collections, all scholars by virtue are digital scholars now. The very fabric of scholarship and research has been altered and hence the way we interpret and utilise that knowledge needs to adapt to suit those needs. Otherwise we run the risk of a world with infinite information, and dearth of wisdom. Literature never takes data at its word. The discipline trains us to question and interpret how meaning is constructed. Hence, the intervention of literary studies becomes impertinent to not only benefit from this digital scholarship, but to also question its motivations and effects. This workshop aims to introduce this new and exciting field of scholarship to its participants, and answer some of the most fundamental questions about it.
